GOING POSTAL

SURVEY GIVES THUMBS DOWN TO HUA HIN P.O.

HUA HIN, THAILAND

The AWOL Mail Survey has now finished, and we would like to thank the readers who responded. The results are fairly unsurprising for most who have lived here for any length of time, and only one respondent had what could be described as positive comments, with a huge majority having experienced major problems with their mail.

Most respondents complained of mail taking either several weeks to arrive or worse, not arriving at all, for both incoming and outgoing mail. Some were sympathetic to the staff with comments about the organisation, staff levels and the actual building being inadequate, and both the sorting and delivery mechanisms are regarded as inefficient - several respondents said that they rarely have the same postman, and many commented on the state of the sorting office, with it variously being described as 'chaotic', 'messy', 'cluttered' and other similar remarks.

Many also suggested that the standard of English ability of the staff could be a major reason for the problems with mail addressed in English. It was encouraging to note that few believed any missing mail was due to theft.

AWOL cannot influence what happens at the Post Office, but we can advise our readers to be careful when sending mail, and to consider other options for both sending and receiving mail; for example there is a private mailbox service available at the Lucky Real Estate office at Makro (Soi 4), and international courier services will deliver and collect. This however does not address the problem of regular incoming mail, such as bills or bank statements, and we strongly suggest that anyone experiencing problems complains not only to Thailand Post, but also to the organisation sending the mail you are expecting or receive late.

MONEY MAKES THE WORLD GO ROUND

By Roger Norwood

A regular chore for most expats in Thailand is dealing with getting hold of their money in bank accounts outside of the kingdom without facing excessive charges or hurdles. There is also the matter of watching the exchange rates, which in some cases can differ wildly both between their home country and here, as well as from week to week.

It seems that currently the Thai baht is starting to slide against many currencies, something that many people feel is long overdue, and while many expats will get excited about the prospect of getting more baht for their Pound, Dollar or Euro, how much better off they will be is subject to some question, as a weaker baht will make imports to Thailand more expensive, and chiefly the most important of those is oil, which would feed into higher prices for virtually everything.

Other expat delicacies from home would also rise, although on the flip side, given the experiences I have had since the pound plummeted against the baht, prices for international air travel are likely to fall when originating from Thailand - the most feasible explanation I have heard regarding the current differences is that the landing fees in Thailand became much more expensive due to the strength of the baht, so we can only assume that this would reverse should the baht weaken significantly, but it shouldn't be a big surprise if it doesn't!.

Back in the heady days of 75 baht to the pound and 40 baht to the dollar, flights originating in Europe were considerably more expensive than those starting in Thailand, and many expats, myself included, made the decision to get a one way ticket and from then on buy returns from Thailand, which was fine until about three or four years ago, when the situation flipped.

The point of my ramblings this week is that we really should be careful what we wish for, unless we are in a position to play both sides of the currency exchange game, which most expats I know are not. In the short term your afternoon beers may become cheap again as the baht slides, but in the long term, probably not.

■ TENNESSEE, USA Bit of a bummer: Woman hospitalised after removing stolen $5,000 from her rectum

A Tennessee woman has been hospitalised after she tried to remove $5,000 (£3,226) from her rectum. Christie Black had stolen the cash from her boyfriend and put it in her 'hiding place', before she was injured trying to remove the money. The 43-year-old reportedly used a toilet brush and tongs to try to pry out the stolen goods, but ended up 'bleeding severely', according to police.

Black is charged with theft and an arrest warrant has been issued after Hawkins County Sheriff's Office was called to the home she shared with boyfriend Bobby Gulley when the incident happened.

Mr Gulley complained that she was stealing from him after he had 'set a trap' to see if she would take the cash he had placed inside two envelopes, in a medicine bag. He said he left the medicine bag on a foosball table and went to bed. When he woke up he found the money was missing and Black was still awake.

Mr Gulley confronted his girlfriend who allegedly vomited up a bag of slightly dissolved pills and confessed to wrapping up the cash and sticking it in her rectum.

HCSO Sgt. Michael Allen said: 'Black admitted to taking the money and medication because Mr Gulley was going to kick her out and she needed money for a place to live.'

On trying the remove the cash, he added, 'she was bleeding severely and was transported to the Hawkins County (Memorial Hospital) emergency room. 'The wad of money was removed and collected as evidence.'

■ LONDON, UK Council's 9-inch double yellow lines thought to be UK's smallest

Bungling contractors for Westminster Council have painted a double yellow line that is just nine inches long. Paving the way for model Minis, the lines were put in between a taxi rank and parking bays on Caxton Street, central London.

'This was a mistake by a contractor. We are obviously not happy about it, because double yellow lines should play an important part in traffic management and road safety,' said Leith Penny, Westminster City Council's strategic director for city management. 'But on this occasion we can see how absurd this looks and we will make sure it is corrected.'

■ A section for all you budding etymologists where each week the origin of a word or phrase is investigated.
This week it is..... Whistle-blower

A person who tries to raise the alarm about a problem and publicizes it inside and/or outside of his/her organization.

If the number of phrases that make direct reference to whistles is anything to go by, whistling looms large in the consciousness of the English-speaking peoples. Examples are: As clean as a whistle, Bells and whistles, Not just whistling Dixie, Pig and Whistle, Wet one's whistle, Whistle and flute, Whistle down the wind, Whistling in a graveyard, Wolf whistle, You can whistle for it.

Similar activities, for instance humming, produce a much shorter list.

'Whistle-blowers' are people who attempt to draw their superiors' attention to something they believe to be wrong and, if they fail in that attempt and if they feel strongly enough about the matter, go public. Such folk may have been around for a long time but it is only recently that they have been given a name.

The expression 'whistle blower' was used literally well before it gained its current figurative meaning. Lots of people blew whistles; hunters were said to 'whistle down the wind' when they let their falcons loose to fly. Sailors, when needing a wind to free a becalmed ship, would 'whistle for it'. The first profession to be labelled as 'whistle blowers' were the US police, who blew whistles to attract attention to wrongdoing. An early example comes from the newspaper The Janesville Gazette, June 1883, in a story about a policeman who woke half the town in order to forestall a riot:

Quiet was restored upon the arrival of the regular police force, and ere the town clock had struck the midnight hour all had returned to their homes. But the crowd of people were all willing to bet that McGinley was the champion whistle blower in America.

More recently, football referees have also been called 'whistle blowers'.

The association with the blowing of whistles and the drawing of attention to a misdemeanour has now been extended into figurative use. The new use of the expression began in the 1960s and the earliest examples of its use are found in journalistic reports of the My Lai massacre in the Vietnam War, in which several hundred civilians were murdered. Such a report, which was made at the stage that newspapers were still reporting My Lai as an 'incident' and 'alleged massacre', was printed in the Lawton Constitutional, December 1969. This dismissed Ronald Ridenhour, the GI that brought the story to the public's attention, as a fortune hunter with a vested interest:

This "whistle-blower" has turned out to be a clever member of the anti-war faction which has been using the alleged misconduct of a few GIs to slander the American Army.

In the 19th century we had 'whistle blowers', in the 20th we had 'whistle-blowers' and now we have 'whistleblowers'. This changing of an expression into a word, with the intervening hyphenated phase, is one of the most common ways we form new words. There are many examples, from Shakespeare's coinages 'birthplace', 'bloodstained' and 'barefaced' (using just the Bs), to more modern-day examples like 'beancounter' and 'bombshell' (and how long before 'modern-day' becomes 'modernday'?).

Search engines seem to have caught on to this mutation of phrases into words very quickly. A Google image search for "whistle blower" brings up pictures of people blowing whistles. A search for "whistleblower" retrieves pictures of Bradley (a.k.a. Chelsea) Manning.

MAGS MEANDERINGS:
FROM SOM TAM

BUM DEAL

Growing up in a city like Hull, once a major UK fishing port, brought with it an unquestioned acceptance of the traditions associated with the fishing industry.

One of those traditions was tattooing, and in much the same way as Royal or Merchant Navy sailors would have their own style of tattoos done, so did the trawler men. Tattooing was seen almost as a right of passage. Possibly as one way to try to ensure that seafarers could be identified should their ship go down, or perhaps just to demonstrate that boys were ready to enter the world of what was very tough and dangerous adult work.

Looking back now it is clear that there was a hierarchy and symbolism in the style of tattoos. Naval officers would have the most elaborate and expensive, often depicting the insignia of their ship, while most trawler men would have an anchor tattooed on one earlobe, together with the almost obligatory heart and arrow on one arm, and names ranging from 'Mum' to Doris - or whoever they happened to be married to at the time.

What they all had in common was a distinct lack of creative artwork. What they didn't have in common was how tattoos were perceived back on dry land by potential employers. The shortage of labour in the immediate post war years in the UK left no room to discriminate against what were then perfectly acceptable signs of military service (and were in any case usually covered) and ex-naval officers almost automatically got jobs in the Civil Service or Local Government.

But by the 1970's attitudes had changed. Woe betide anyone with a visible tattoo who wanted a job in catering, or even retail work. Employers felt that customers didn't want to see tattooed staff, and there were plenty of 'clean' applicants to choose from. Fast forward to the 2000's and a new generation of expertly tattooed and often very successful professional bodies has emerged. The Beckham full sleeve tattoos haven't detracted from his appeal as a role model - or as a model for underwear, and may even have helped him. After all - we need something other than a pair of plain white knickers to look at, and tattooing is now an accepted and respected form of art.

So we shouldn't really be surprised by Cheryl Coles' newly decorated derriere, which is reported to have taken 15 hours to complete. A wild underestimation if ever I heard one, and a true testament to the Chelsea flower show.

At least Cheryl will still be able to get a job at MacDonalds should she ever need to, and can now put her own interpretation on those old lyrics 'I never promised you a rose garden'.

BALEFUL

BALE NOT ALLOWED ON PITCH AT SAME TIME AS OTHER PLAYERS, INSURERS INSIST

■ MADRID, SPAIN

INSURERS have banned Carlo Ancelotti from picking Gareth Bale in case he gets broken.

After paying £86M for the former Spurs silverback, Real Madrid will only allow Bale to run around the pitch of the Bernabeau once everybody else has gone home.

The Welshman will spend the rest of his time locked in a gilded tower, like a lonely princess in a children's fairy tale.

Real president Florentino Pérez said: "Gareth is important for our mid-term marketing strategy and season ticket holders can look at him through the bars of his dressing room whenever they want.

"As long as they don't try to feed him, of course. For context, the bloke who bought Munch's The Scream only paid £76M, for which he got to keep it rather than rent it for six years like we have with Gareth.

"And I bet he doesn't sling it onto his lawn every Saturday and let the gardeners kick lumps out of it."

Club doctors have also advised Bale to cease rolling around on the floor like a dog in a sand pit whenever anybody goes near him, in case he dislocates a shoulder.

Pérez said: "It's too risky to let Gareth score a goal, then do that heart thing with his hands and make half of Spain want to snap his fingers off."

Above: Bale carefully hides his ears as he shows fans what he will do if they get behind him and give him bananas
